vell apoplexy. The unlucky M. Bartomicus is left nen exposed to the malice of his enemies, and sees ling; no way of life open to him but that which, on the authority of the Bishop of Oxford, we know the to be the normal and of a degraded French did priest. He becomes a cabman. The infamy of is to this position is to his mind so-great that he andy carefully conceals it from his mother and his inges adored Felicie, leading them to believe that he is employed in a public office. Unluckily Félicie onth. comes to Paris oue day, and eatle a cab, with pped; a view of visiting M. Bertomicux's mother—a ongh poor old woman who follows him throughout bis niafortanes: He tries to conceal himself; but few his efforts are in vain. "Oui Félicie." ha you exclaims, " c'est vroi. Je suis celui à qui vous riend arez dit: Cocher, payer-rous!" The lady had a the netually trusted the cabman to take his own very fare out of a napoleon-perhaps in obedience in- to some occult sense of sympathy. The avowal teguis too much. Poor Felicie goes home and Lord dies of an anenrism; and Bertomieux writes land his memoirs on scraps of paper and flying that leaves often in pencil, at the corner of the Rue peck Monthabor and the Rue de Luxembourg, on the why miserable sent of his cab. Let us hope he has e re- made a good thing of it during the present year. even. In point of salary, his position must, we would quite think, have been better than when he was a rish country curate. It would be difficult to say anything new upon the influence of celibacy; and M. Bertomieux's oyed experience upon this point seems to prove little the beyond the obvious truth that, when a beautiful favat and accomplished girl falls desperately in love the with you, it is very unpleasant to be forbidden and to marry her. In another direction, his comone, plaints are rather less familiar to Englishmen. out The working of the French system, according

This time the cure recover, fuses to bury him, and is discharged from the his office for his want of Christian charity, in. This last misfortune illustrates another growing e, he evil. The intelligence of the country having a the boon alienated, it has become the duty of the hood parish priest to collect a few women as depotes, and to stimulate their piety by inculcating reding, pense of rational religion. These women that become a kind of spiritual body-guard, entitled, ween in their turn, to exercise a certain influence utive upon their pastor. Ladies of aristocratic factors milies have, in a higher appear, an influence as is upon the bishop similar to that which the the humbler women exercise upon the country mple curd. It is by the backstairs intrigues of one fart, of those ladius that the curd is punished for from refusing burial to the disreputable country gentleman. Re afterwards meets with a lady from of still more malign influence, who plays to en to him the part of Potiphar's wife, and finally man rains him in the esteem of his blahop. If we ould may trust the curd's description, this feminine inony fluence, which naturally results from the untagonism of the Church to the masouline inteland lect, has become all pervading and all corrupting ment Moreover, in France it is specially injurious, because the cure is there are absolute slave of his ca of bishop. The bishop has become like the general of tree on army, to whom the unlacky cure stands in the insic post to another at the arbitrary will of his suho is perior.
